Special Assistant to the Director of Personnel

This summer has resulted in great clarification of my career goals. The work assigned to me has been quite satisfactory in terms of substance and responsibility, and I hope my performance has been as good as was expected by this office, which volunteered for a summer intern. The amount of work surpassed by far last summer's, which is fine with me. In fact, the added responsibility only spurred my writing skills and understanding of bureaucratic procedures.

I regret not having been able to attend all the intern briefings, but I was being tested on certain days for the Career Training Program. In any event, as a veteran summer intern the briefings were no longer that important to my understanding of the Agency.

I feel I have made many new friends this year. [redacted] is a demanding boss, but one who has taken the time to help me improve my methodology and writing. [redacted] has been more than patient in working with my written presentations. I would hope to return here if there is an opening when I finish Career Training.
